Since the third estate had the largest number of people in France, they broke away from the Estates-General and formed the National Assembly. The Tennis Court Oath was when the members of the National Assembly met at an indoor tennis court and formed a new constitution for the French government.

The start of the French Revolution was when they stormed the Bastille. They were looking for weapons, ammunition and prisoners, but they only found seven prisoners! The document of the revolution was called The Declaration of the Rights of Man.

The Reign of Terror was when Robespierre allowed the police to arrest and kill anyone who was considered an “enemy of the revolution”.
